

Aplicación de Random Projections

May 8, 2018

1 Implementación del método de Random Projections para el corpus generado por los artículos del 2016 del New York Times

A continuación se implementará el método propuesto en este paper.

La idea es generar la matriz  $M'_{p \times m}$  a partir de la matriz  $M_{p \times n}$  y la matriz de proyecciones  $R_{n \times m}$ . Donde:

- $p$  = cantidad de documentos
- $n$  = cantidad de palabras en el vocabulario
- $m$  = cantidad de tópicos

La matriz  $M$  contiene una fila por documento y una columna por cada término dentro del vocabulario. El elemento  $M_{i,j}$  contendrá una medida de la cantidad de veces que aparece el término  $j$  en el documento  $i$ . Para nuestro caso, esa medida será el tfidf. La matriz  $M$  es sparsa ya que para un documento en particular, la gran mayoría de las palabras no aparecerá.

La matriz  $M'$  contiene una fila por documento y una columna por cada tópico. El elemento  $M'_{i,j}$  contiene una medida de cuánto aporta el tópico  $j$  a la construcción del documento  $i$ .

El método propuesto por el paper consta en:

- 1) Construcción de la matriz  $M_{p \times n}$  a partir del corpus generado por los artículos del New York Times del 2016. Esto se hará en un script de Python aparte para no ensuciar con código secundario esta notebook.
- 2) Generación de la matriz de proyección  $R$ . Mas adelante se dará un detalle de la generación de esta matriz.
- 3) Cálculo de la matriz  $M'$  como la proyección definida por  $R$  de la matriz  $M$  en el espacio de menor dimensión.

Una vez calculada esta transformación, podremos hacer el siguiente análisis:

- 1) Tomar una palabra en particular del vocabulario (como un documento en el espacio de dimensión  $n$  cuyas componentes son todas cero salvo la componente que representa la palabra elegida que vale uno), transformarla con  $R$  y recuperar los  $k$  documentos vecinos.
- 2) Tomar varias palabras del vocabulario (mismo procedimiento que el anterior, pero con más componentes en uno), transformarlas con  $R$  y recuperar los  $k$  documentos vecinos a este vector en el espacio de dimensión reducida.

- 3) Tomar documentos de referencia de  $M'$  y buscar sus  $k$  documentos mas cercanos en el espacio de dimensión reducida.

Para cada punto definido anteriormente, se puede hacer una evaluación cualitativa de los resultados. ** Discutir un mecanismo de evaluación cuantitativo.****

2 Construcción de la matriz $M$

Para construir la matriz  $M$  se utilizarán los artículos extraídos en esta notebook.

Primero se cargarán los artículos y luego se construirá la matriz  $M$  utilizando el paquete `tfidf` de `sklearn`.

In [1]: from sklearn.feature_extraction.text import TfidfVectorizer, CountVectorizer import json
from time import time
with open('articulos_2016_procesados.json') as f:
    data = json.load(f)
articulos=list(data.values())
ids=list(data.keys())
tfidf_vectorizer = TfidfVectorizer(max_df=1., min_df=1) t0 = time()
tfidf = tfidf_vectorizer.fit_transform(articulos)
print("done in %.3fs." % (time() - t0))

done in 11.538s.

2.1 Generación de la matriz de proyección $R$

Según lo visto en el paper de referencia [1], los elementos  $r_{i,j}$  de la matriz  $R$  se calculan como:

$$r_{i,j} = \sqrt{s} \begin{cases} 1 & \text{con probabilidad } \frac{1}{2s} \\ 0 & \text{con probabilidad } 1 - \frac{1}{s} \\ -1 & \text{con probabilidad } \frac{1}{2s} \end{cases}$$

In [3]: import numpy as np from scipy import spatial from sklearn.random_projection import SparseRandomProjection
p=tfidf.shape[0]
m=200
n=tfidf.shape[1]
density=1/np.sqrt(n) density=1/3
rp=SparseRandomProjection(n_components=m, density=density) rp.fit(tfidf)
```

```
Out[3]: SparseRandomProjection(dense_output=False, density=0.3333333333333333, eps=0.1, n_components=200, random_state=None)

- Complejidad de cada algoritmo
